Beliefs regarding optimal configuration of streets upon which a city is built varied with culture and evolved with the times. The ancient Greeks and Romans built gridiron plans, while other parts of Europe gave rise to organic, meandering, medieval patterns that were eventually brought to the New World.

The care of the streets and roads within the Roman territory was committed in the earliest times to the censors. They eventually made contracts for paving the street inside Rome, including the Clivus Capitolinus, with lava, and for laying down the roads outside the city with gravel. Sidewalks were also provided.

The grid plan, grid street plan, or gridiron plan is a type of city plan in which streets run at right angles to each other, forming a grid. The infrastructure cost for regular grid patterns is generally higher than for patterns with discontinuous streets. Costs for streets depend largely on four variables: street width, Street networks may be planned according to clear organizing principles or they may evolve organically through accretion, but their configurations and orientations help define a city's spatial logic and order.

Measures of entropy reveal a city's streets' order and disorder.
