To create the cat music, Snowdon and his colleagues tried to mimic natural cat sounds, using sliding notes and high pitches—cat calls tend to be an octave or more above human voices. The researchers based the tempo of the songs on purring and suckling sounds.

Scientists Create Music For Cats, And Fur A Good Reason ...

A study by Charles Snowdon, an animal behaviorist at the University of Wisconsin, and David Teie from the University of Maryland School of Music, evaluates how cats respond to classical music compared to cat-specific music. Cat-specific music isn't cat sounds but music that features pitch, tempo, and timbre that cats find naturally appealing; for example, the tempo of purring, the suckling sound during nursing, and frequencies in feline vocal range, which is two octaves higher than for humans.
