The paintings of Winslow Homer (1836–1910) capture the agonies and triumphs of nineteenth-century Americans and the power of land and sea. Although some of his most famous works describe extraordinary moments of human struggle, his subjects are more typically individuals engaged in the activities of daily life.

Flamborough Head, England shows Maggie Storey, one of Homer's favorite models, standing resolutely upon the high chalk cliffs of Flamborough. Bearing the burden of a large basket and with her hands firmly on her hips, she is every bit the strong fisherwoman, the artist's most frequent subject during his English sojourn of 1881-82.
